everyone know what happened in Sunday night's episode, "The Lucky Ones." It was my favorite show of the week so far. The writing was stellar, and I was rooting for the survivors all the way. We start out with a talk by de-ice-man, Walt, who's afraid of his own emotions, afraid of the fear he shows to all. His daughter (Kate) is right there with him, wanting his approval. Walt isn't buying it. The Fearless Leader comes home to tell his family he's having trouble being away from the camp, and he's okay with it. He's not going to leave -- not before the plane can take off. Kate hangs up from her call with her father, watching all the emotions flash across his face from happiness to despair, in a three-second span. She's afraid this fear is his. She says she won't be afraid of him or his emotions. And she texts the entire camp his biggest fear: that he won't make it home. Jorja finds a book in the ammo room, a book of poetry. It's short and beautiful. It reads: When this is done, And time and tide wait for no man, When the wedding bells begin

What's new in Cyto:

chrome P450 monooxygenase (P450 or CYP) is the largest family of detoxification enzyme, known as hemoproteins, which can catalyze reactions of some exogenous and endogenous toxicants at specific P450 binding sites[@b1]. P450 is consisted of multiple types of isozymes, mainly classified into 2 kinds: the relatively stable isozymes and the highly regulated isozymes[@b2]. P450 plays important physiological and pathophysiological functions in multiple organs of animals. P450 catalyzes the rate-limiting step of phase 1 detoxification, which is responsible for metabolism of a variety of chemically reactive compounds[@b3]. It is reported that P450 disorders and changes in metabolisms were closely associated with a variety of diseases, including cancer, metabolic disorders, and neurological diseases[@b4][@b5]. P450 has been recognized as an important drug target that influences the activity of drugs in the past decades[@b6]. Thus, P450 is included in some important drug developing programs, such as the "diabetes" drug, "cancer" drug, and "hypertension" drug. A strong binding affinity to P450 is considered the essential criterion for these drugs. Recent study found that a multi-body docking predictor, which contained selected atomic contacts within the binding site and a  $\Delta G$  computations, performed better than a single body docking predictor in predicting P450 binding affinity[@b7]. Moreover, an in vivo study of seven P450 isozymes of drug-drug interaction for clinical medicines revealed that five drug-drug pairs displayed the expected metabolism trends due to the P450 inhibitions[@b8]. Therefore, the high-throughput determination of P450 inhibition is considered as an important strategy for drug development. Researchers have found that the structure of P450, which belongs to the member of hemoprotein family, would be the determinant[@b9][@b10][@b11][@b12]. However, a precise binding mechanism and prediction method are still lacking. Although the crystal structure of P450 from Nippostrongylus brieschkei (NbCyp6AS1) (PDB ID: 3B8S)

was successfully determined in 2013[@b13], none of the P450 structures in complex with drugs are available until now. The lack of the crystal structure caused major problems for the structure-based drug design.
