Neuropathic pain is a common condition which results from injury to the nervous system, and is associated with significant chronic pain. Whilst many treatments are available for patients with neuropathic pain, many patients do not respond to these treatments or develop adverse side effects. Current models and tools for assessing and treating neuropathic pain in rodents are limited, particularly with respect to both the temporal/spatial aspects of neuropathic pain, and the induction and nature of pain that develops as a result of specific injuries. However, a number of transgenic mouse models of neuropathic pain have been generated, with the majority resulting in the development of persistent pain which may be of particular relevance to the neuropathic pain experience of patients. Recently, the importance of genetic background has been demonstrated, with data suggesting that similar pain behaviours can be differentially induced in different inbred mouse strains. Furthermore, there is now an increasing awareness of common genetic variants as risk factors for neuropathic pain in patients. Whilst there are currently no genetic risk factors for neuropathic pain identified, the identification of risk factors for neuropathic pain will provide the opportunity to investigate the underlying mechanisms of this condition, and to identify new pathways which may be targeted for future treatments.Q: Probability of event E occurring in a large population The probability of a person being old(where old is defined as being 40 or over) in a large population is $\frac{a}{b}$ where a is the number of people who are old and b is the total population of the people. Then I am asked to calculate the probability of E occurring. I think that the answer is $P(E) = \frac 6d1f23a050
