surgery on the body, especially to surgical instruments and implants useful in implantation of fasteners in body tissue to hold together two or more body tissue portions, to stabilize bones and to secure soft tissue to bones. More specifically, the scope of this invention relates to improvements in the construction and operation of surgical instruments for implanting fasteners, for holding tissue portions and for stabilizing fractured bones or holding together body tissues to be rejoined. Typically, in the repair of fractures and in the correction of other bone or soft tissue deformities, a damaged bone is cut and a bore formed in the bone. A threaded implant or a fastener is then implanted in the bore and the fragments of the bone are then aligned and held together by the threaded fastener or the implant. To form a bore in a bone is quite difficult, particularly when the bore must be formed in a region having a small cross-sectional area. A minimally invasive and efficacious way of forming such a bore is by way of a dental surgical procedure commonly referred to as osteotomy. In this procedure, a dental drill is used to form a hole in the bone. This hole must be drilled larger than the maximum desired diameter of the fastener. To achieve this enlargement, a spade or a reamer is typically used. Generally, the spade is attached to the end of a dental drill so that the spade can be brought into cutting contact with
